

Spano, it was overcoming her addiction to caffeine pills.

“A little just spun out of control, and before I knew it I was an addict. But with the help of my friends, I overcame my addiction,” said Spano, who reportedly began taking the pills to stay up late to study in hopes of being accepted at Stansbury University.

Although all of the tales are epic examples of triumph in what seem like hopeless situations, none are quite as inspiring as Screech’s tale of success.

When Screech’s lucky barrie went missing right before the City Chess Championships, it looked doubtful that Powers could top Valley’s, Bayside’s rival, Russian foreign exchange student. But with the love of his girlfriend Violet and the support of his friends, who had tried to kidnap Screech’s opponent and trick Screech with fake barriers, Power’s was able to overcome the Russian chess champion.

While many criticized President George W. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney for not visiting the south right after Hurricane Katrina tore through the area, nothing could be further from the truth.

These photo’s, which are a LowDown exclusive, show that the President and Vice President were amongst the very first people on the scene.

While others were fleeing New Orleans and other cities, in fear of their lives, the President was actually out in the Gulf of Mexico surfing. Not many people are aware of this, but the President is a big surfer.

In the first few days of the storm the President even managed to ride a few waves through some of the devastated areas. And who were the first people to investigate the damage? The President and Vice President.

While President Bush chose to tour the area via a wakeboard, Vice President Cheney stuck with a good old-fashioned tube. This once again proves that all of the media reports showing that the President and Vice President did not act for the first five days of the storm, leaving some without food and water, are nothing more than liberal hogwash.
